Ella is living with a group of friends in a city with the kinds of social and dating interactions they have. I love that each girl was different in their opinions on love and dating, but they each had so much respect for each other and came rallying when one needed them. Even if they had warned their friend, it didn't matter in the end.

The first three quarters of the book dragged. Too much unnecessary dialogue and almost exhausting to get to the point. At times I had to skip-read through the material just to keep from getting bored. The characters were descriptive enough for you to understand their lives but just too many unnecessary words, as if the author was paid by the word.
