Coethnicity Diversity And The Dilemmas

Coethnicity reports the results of a landmark study that aimed to find out why diversity has this cooperation-undermining effect. The study, conducted in a neighborhood of Kampala, Uganda, notable for both its high levels of diversity and low levels of public goods provision, hones in on the mechanisms that might account for the difficulties diverse societies often face in trying to act collectively.

The negative consequences of ethnic diversity on African development have been a very popular topic for social scientists in recent years, with a flood of articles linking diversity and low economic growth, conflict, inequality, and poor public goods provision. Yet none of this scholarship attempted to investigate the mechanism by which diversity harms development – or not, at least, until the four authors reviewed here launched a project in Uganda to answer this question.
