Every raw food and manufactured product has an acceptable range of color appearance that depends on factors associated with the consumer and the nature of the surroundings at time of judgment and the structure and pigmentation of the food itself. However, color specification alone is insufficient to define food appearance. The color quality of the illumination, in terms of intensity, color temperature and fidelity and the nature of the structure of the product all affect the appearance.

Introduction. Much of man's behaviour is controlled by appearance, but the appearance of his food is of paramount importance to his health and well-being. In day-to-day survival and marketing situations, we can tell whether or not most foods are fit to eat from their optical properties. Although vision and colour perception are the means by which we appreciate our surroundings, visual acceptance depends on more than just colour.

The idea is simple enough: Food colours are added to foods to change their colour and appearance – often to help consumers find them more appealing. Colouring compounds can be natural compounds, man-made (or synthetic) dyes that have been shown to be safe to add to foods, or full extracts of foods or herbs that are added for their colour properties.

Food colours: Why do they matter?

The two things that stood out at us the most where the colors white and blue. Blue is listed all across the web as a color used to suppress appetites. In fact, they go as far as to say to install a blue light bulb in your refrigerator to discourage your late night munchies or your in between meal snacks. On the opposite end of the spectrum, white, which is used abundantly in many homes, restaurants, stores and more creates a mindless effect when it comes to your eating behaviors.
