Right Hemisphere Stroke: A Victim Reflects on ...

14 August, 2017. Fact Checked. The two main types of stroke are ischemic, which is caused by an interruption in the brain's blood flow, and hemorrhagic, which is caused by blood leaking into the brain. The way a stroke affects someone depends largely on where in the brain the stroke takes place. The motor control areas of the brain affect the opposite side of the body, so the effects of right hemisphere stroke will affect the left side of the body.

The Effects of a Right Hemisphere Stroke | Healthfully

A right-brain stroke survivor may have a hard time with processing information (visual and verbal) and decreased cognitive (thinking) skills such as poor judgment, short attention span, and short-term memory loss. Caregivers can take steps to help stroke survivors deal with limitations of right-brain injury, once their limitations are recognized.

How to Better Communicate with Stroke Patients

Stroke can sometimes damage the parts of the brain that receive, process and interpret information sent by the eyes. This can result in losing half the field of vision – for example, only being able to see the left or right side of what's in front of you. Stroke can also affect the control of the eye muscles. This can cause double vision.
