Why Life Seems to Speed Up as We Age - YouTube

Time seems to speed up as one ages, and it affects how people find meaning in life and plan their future. What creates this perception? We examine the role of "chunking" – mentally bundling individual moments of experience under broad categories. With age, people group experiences into progressively bigger chunks (e.g., work, family). Consequently, fewer things seem to have occurred in a given period, so it seems to have passed faster in retrospect.

The greater our acquaintance with the routines of everyday life, the quicker we perceive time to pass and, generally, as we age, this familiarity increases. This theory suggests that, in order to make our time last longer, we should fill our lives with new and varied experiences, eschewing the time-sapping routine of the everyday.
