Therapy works by having us examine the way we think and how we can change the way we think. It allows us to recognize negative cognitions and their effects, which can help us change them. A third reason why therapy works is that it allows you to look inside yourself. Insight that comes from introspection allows you to change old patterns of behavior.

Centers

In this article Louis Cozolino talks about why therapy works by looking at three fundamental mechanisms of brain, mind, and relationships: 1. The brain is a social organ of adaptation, shaped by evolution to connect with and change through interactions with others. Psychotherapy leverages the ability of brains to attune and learn from one another in the service of adaptive change.

Therapists makes use of our basic human need for connection, understanding, and belonging—needs that are hardwired in us. By creating a relationship where clients can feel safe enough to let go of misperceptions of themselves and others and to try out new behaviors, therapists open the door for clients to discover and accept a more nuanced view of themselves and their situation, which aids them in healing.
