Redox Titration is a laboratory method of determining the concentration of a given analyte by causing a redox reaction between the titrant and the analyte. These types of titrations sometimes require the use of a potentiometer or a redox indicator. Redox titration is based on an oxidation-reduction reaction between the titrant and the analyte.

As it is discussed in the volumetric glassware and selection of sample size and titrant volume sections, using 50 mL burettes and about 80-90% of their volume guarantees the smallest possible relative error of titration (it doesn't guarantee accuracy of the determination). Also using large (20 or 25 mL) single volume pipettes means smaller relative errors.

Titration and titrimetric methods - sources of errors

During a titration experiment systematic errors such as the calibration of the burette and glassware, the quality of the reagents and determination of the end point. The largest and most important error is the determination of the end point because it is usually done visually using a chemical indicator. This occurs when you think you see the end of the reaction when the color changes but the equivalence point was already passed and this lag creates the error.
