Hong Kong's substantive divorce law (3) mirrors the current law in England and Wales, in that there is only one ground upon which parties may petition for divorce, i.e. that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. However, the facts upon which parties may rely upon do differ, the main difference being the availability of the two separation facts within shorter timescales.

Hong Kong family law commentators have made clear the duration of a marriage will make a difference. An equal division is more likely in a longer marriage. In another case decided at the same time but in a lower court, a wife only received one third of the wealthy husband's assets to reflect the shortness (3 years) and relatively unproductive nature of the marriage.
