Minimal Ethics For The Anthropocene

Even though Minimal Ethics for the Anthropocene is first and foremost concerned with life—understood as both a biological and social phenomenon—it is the narrative about the impending death of the human population (i.e., about the extinction of the human species), that provides a context for its argument. “Anthropocene” names a geo-historical period in which humans are said to have become the biggest threat to life on earth.

Open Humanities Press- Minimal Ethics for the Anthropocene

Minimal ethics for the Anthropocene is not just an updated form of environmental ethics: it does not pivot on any coherent notion of an “environment” (or, as mentioned earlier, “nature”) as an identifiable entity but rather concerns itself with dynamic relations between entities across various scales such as stem cells, flowers, dogs, humans, rivers, electricity pylons, computer networks, and planets, to name but a few.

Minimal ethics for the Anthropocene is therefore less about building a better world as an external unity and more about making better cuts into that which we are naming the world. But, to avoid becoming yet another masculinist enterprise which knows in advance and once and for all what it is striving for, the minimal ethics proposed here has to embrace the very openness and vagueness of its premises.

Minimal Ethics for the Anthropocene. 2. Scale. Fig. 3. Joanna Zylinska, Topia daedala 3, 2014. The minimal ethics posited in this book needs to be thought on a universal scale. This may sound like a paradox, yet it will only seem so if we rush ahead of ourselves and expect such ethics to furnish us with some generally applicable principles that will have to remain valid across all times and locales.

Minimal Ethics for the Anthropocene. 5. Humanity. Fig. 6. Joanna Zylinska, Topia daedala 6, 2014. This chapter provides some further historical and intellectual context for the concept of the human. This concept has not enjoyed a particularly good reception in recent critical theory: “the human” has been exposed by postructuralism and posthumanism as nothing more than a fantasy of unity and selfhood that excludes the human’s dependency on other beings and non-living entities; it has ...

Minimal Ethics for the Anthropocene. 8. Poetics. Fig. 9. Joanna Zylinska, Topia daedala 9, 2014. If we humans have a singular responsibility to give an account of the differentiations of matter, of which we are part, such practices of account-giving establish a constitutive link between ethics and poetics. Indeed, we encounter ethics precisely via stories and images, i.e., through textual and visual narratives—from sacred texts, works of literature and iconic paintings through to various ...
